

Homosexual minister goes on trial Monday

By MICHAEL MOKRZYCKI
Associated Press Writer

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — A United Methodist Church trial starts Monday for a lesbian minister who is battling her dismissal by challenging church law that says homosexuality is incompatible with Christian teaching.

"That's a pretty broad statement to make," said the Rev. Rose Mary Denman. "If church law said homosexuality is incompatible with current United Methodist teaching, then I wouldn't have a leg to stand on."

The law was refined in 1984 at the quadrennial United Methodist general conference to make explicit the ban against ordination or appointment of homosexual ministers.

At the time, Denman had not accepted that she was a lesbian and supported the ban, telling her superiors she might even leave the denomination if homosexuals were allowed to become pastors.

Denman, 40, says she went from "blatant, raw, fear-filled homophobia" to acceptance of her own lesbianism in a matter of months. She confided this to her superior, Bishop George Bashore of Boston, and the church granted her two, one-year leaves from her two parishes in Conway, N.H. She moved to Portland, Maine, with her lover, the ex-wife of a minister.

Denman plans to transfer in November to the Unitarian Universalist Association, which she finds more accepting of her lifestyle, and she sought a third leave to cover the period until then.

United Methodist law allows up to five consecutive leaves, but the church's Board of Ordained Ministry denied her another leave.

Then the church's New Hampshire annual conference ordered a trial on whether to defrock Denman. The trial, with a jury of 13 ministers, starts Monday in Durham.

In a telephone interview last week, Denman said she is fighting her ouster on principle. The United Universalist Association has told her that, barring other complications, she will be accepted as a minister regardless of the outcome of the Methodist trial.

"Who wants to leave with the governing body saying that you are unacceptable, that your behavior is inappropriate and that they have no regard for you as a member of the clergy? That's what happens if I don't put up a fight," Denman said.

To buttress her argument that church law too broadly labels homosexuality as inconsistent with Christian teaching, Denman plans to call three witnesses, all theologians from non-Methodist Christian denominations, one a lesbian.

But Denman said the trial's presiding bishop, Neil Irons, has asked her counsel, the Rev. John McDougall of Enfield, not to call the witnesses. Church law allows the presiding bishop to refuse any witness.

"John insisted it was his right to call them. Also it is Bishop Irons' right not to allow them, but John was going to force the issue" on the record Monday, Denman said.

A spokeswoman at Irons' office in Pennington, N.J., said Friday the bishop had no comment.

é that
green
S-M-L,
cotton
00, in

SIGNATURE ACCENTS. The detail count. Clutch with drop-in shoulder of linen logo design. Vinyl in sand taupe or black, 58.00. Collection signature checkbook clutches, key indexers, French purses, 10.00 to 48. Accessories.

SMART STEPS. Liz Claiborne help put your best foot forward with a polished leather pump. Black, gold, plum or sizes 7 1/2 - 8 1/2N, 6-10M. 74.00, in S

Gay Catholics arrested

NEW YORK (AP) — A protest Mass celebrated outside St. Patrick's Cathedral led to the arrest of 23 homosexuals demonstrating against what they consider to be their exclusion from the church.

The demonstration Sunday was the latest in a series by Dignity, an organization of homosexual Roman Catholics that has been banned from using facilities of the New York archdiocese.

Group wants to help homosexuals obtain a heterosexual orientation

(EDITOR'S NOTE — Attitudes toward homosexuality have changed in recent years, but there's a small and reportedly growing group among gay men and women who believe homosexuals can and should shift to heterosexual orientation. The group is dedicated to furthering that effort.)

By DANA KENNEDY

Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) — In his youth and in his 20s, Randy Childs remembers going to Boston's red-light district, the Combat Zone, for furtive homosexual encounters. These days, married and the father of a newborn, Childs helps others trying to overcome homosexuality.

Childs, 40, was among seven men and one woman who gathered upstairs at Ruggles Baptist Church one recent Saturday night, but most in the group were reluctant to talk openly about their goal: attempting to shed homosexuality and lead a straight life.

Though the group calls itself Homosexuals Anonymous and follows some of the same precepts espoused by Alcoholics Anonymous, Gamblers Anonymous and similar organizations, Childs said the movement to help homosexuals go straight is still an "open secret."

Because those who join such groups are concerned about what they regard as the stigma of homosexuality and doubt if they can overcome it, they hesitate to discuss their struggle publicly, group leaders said.

But groups to help homosexuals attain a heterosexual orientation are growing around the country, with a jump in membership in the past few years since the AIDS epidemic has taken hold, those active in that effort say. They acknowledge that only a small fraction of the gay population is involved.

Most of the groups dedicated to helping homosexuals go straight are religious, usually evangelical. They are called "ex-gay ministries" and include such groups as Homosexuals Anonymous, based in Reading, Pa., Life Ministry in New York, Desert Stream in Santa Monica, Calif., and Exodus International and Love in Action, both based in San Rafael, Calif.

While some of the most active in the movement believe homosexuality to be an aberration, the majority said they are not anti-gay.

"If you want to stay gay, that's your business," said Sy Rogers, 30, of Orlando, Fla., who calls himself a former homosexual and transsexual and is now married and the father of one. "But the bottom line is, you have a choice to overcome it. You can change."

AP Newsfeatures photo

Group leaders — Randy Childs, left, and Peter Robicheau Jr., are active in the Homosexuals Anonymous group.

Peter Robicheau, one of the group leaders of Homosexuals Anonymous in Boston, said, "It doesn't happen overnight. You change as you begin to discover the origins and roots of your homosexuality. The biggest thing is to be able to share it."

Robicheau, 32 and single, said he has not practiced homosexuality but it has been part of his "thought life." He said he has never been active sexually and does not plan to before he is married.

Most of the groups maintain that homosexuality is a learned behavior stemming from an early emotional detachment from a same-sex parent. They counsel new members that heterosexuality can be attained by overcoming what they believe was the emotional neediness that caused them to be homosexual.

THEIR THEORIES CLASH with more prevalent thoughts about homosexuality.

"These kinds of programs fly in the face of all social science research," said Urvashi Vaid, spokesman for the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force in Washington, D.C. "We think these are people really troubled by their sexuality who've constructed a whole mythology about how it is morally wrong. Programs of conversion are dangerous — they're based on an erroneous understanding of sexual behavior."

Ex-gay ministries point out that sex therapists William Masters and Virginia Johnson offer a program for those who want to turn away from homosexuality. A handful of psychiatrists, such as Lawrence Hatterer, who spent 15 years at New York's Payne Whitney clinic at New York Hospital and wrote "Changing Homosexuality in the Male," also believe homosexuality results from environmental factors.

"Most people don't think it's possible to change," said Frank Worthen, 58, founder of Love in Action, one of the first ex-gay ministries, who spent 25 years in what those in the movement call the "gay subculture."

Worthen said he was close to suicide after his years as an active homosexual, which he said began at age 13 when he was initiated into homosexuality by his pastor.

"When I was 19 I went to San Francisco to live and from the eyes of a 19-year-old, it was a pretty exciting life," said Worthen, who married a woman he met through his ministry

three years ago. "I had been rejected in high school. I never had friends. To enter this lifestyle where people are like you is very exciting."

Despite several serious relationships, including one that lasted 11 years, Worthen says he became "despondent and unhappy."

"I got into a promiscuous lifestyle that hurt my self-esteem," he said. "I was thinking about committing suicide. A lot of my friends had. They said they had had the best years of the gay life and didn't want to face the last years because of the rejection."

When Worthen made the decision to give up homosexuality, "I felt like a weight had been lifted off my shoulders."

Stories like Worthen's are not uncommon within ex-gay ministries.

Sy Rogers is one of the most unusual examples. Now married and the father of a 2-year-old daughter, 10 years ago Rogers lived as a woman with two other homosexuals in preparation for a sex-change operation.

Rogers said he began having homosexual encounters when he was 8. In a brief autobiography titled "The Man in the Mirror," passed out at ex-gay ministries, Rogers tells of a youth spent wishing he were a girl.

"Watching movies as a child, I remember the girl was always the object of the hero's attention and affection," Rogers wrote. "My heart would ache as I thought 'I wish I were wanted like that.'"

IN HIS YOUTH, Rogers became involved in prostitution and drug abuse and served as best man in a wedding ceremony for two homosexual friends. Later, he started taking female hormones and began living as a woman in anticipation of a sex-change operation.

Like Worthen, Rogers said his disillusionment with what he calls his "Twilight Zone" existence led him to seek change. He said a religious experience helped him overcome homosexuality. He met his wife in a Bible study group.

Rogers now runs his own ministry in Orlando, delivers a weekly radio program called the "Sy Rogers Report" and this fall launched a weekly cable television program called "Turnaround."

Bishops to discuss homosexuality

By VIVIAN CANNON

Press Register Religion Editor

The United Methodist bishop for the Alabama-West Florida Conference said Tuesday in Point Clear that he does not expect approval of changes at the denomination's general conference in April that would allow a homosexual to be ordained as a minister.

Several church agencies have proposed the changes, said Bishop J. Lloyd Knox of Birmingham, but efforts to kill the measure are already under way.

Alabama's delegates are "solidly against" the changes, he said.

Knox said the Book of Discipline under its social principals recognizes the "civil and human rights" of all people but those guidelines "do not condone the practice of homosexuality and consider this practice incompatible with Christian teaching."

RULES FOR ordination deny the practice and prevent "self-avowing practicing homosexuals" from either being ordained as ministers or appointed to church offices.

"We feel — at least I do — that the ministry is not a civil right," said Knox. "It is a calling."

Knox said "a lot of homosexuals feel they are born that way but we say, 'If you are, then your Christian faith should give you self-discipline.'"

Except for the homosexual issue which Knox labeled as "sensationalism," he expects the annual meeting to be "relatively dull."

A new and controversial hymnal which has been edited to meet the demands of members will probably be approved, he said, and should be ready for distribution by 1989.

HE ALSO hopes the general conference will approve a change being presented by him that would give him a counterpart in Alabama.

Knox currently serves as bishop of the North Alabama Conference as well as the one in the southern half of the state and Florida panhandle.

It requires him to oversee 21 separate districts which involve approximately 1,600 churches and more than 300,000 members and could be better handled by two bishops in the state.

The general conference will be held April 26-May 6 in St. Louis.

Abp. May re-affirms statement on AIDS

WASHINGTON (NC) — Here is the text of the Dec. 29 statement by Archbishop John L. May of St. Louis, president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and U.S. Catholic Conference, on the status of the AIDS statement issued by the USCC Administrative Board.

On December 17, I wrote to all the bishops a private letter concerning the recent statement of the Administrative Board of the conference on "The Many Faces of AIDS."

My letter reviewed in some detail the careful preparation which preceded the issuance of the statement. It also reviewed some of the widespread misperceptions occasioned by the document's release — misperceptions which brought some measure of pain to some of my fellow bishops.

Finally, I suggested in the letter that the June meeting of the conference might include a full discussion of certain principles of moral theology and their specific application to the AIDS epidemic in this country. The primary purpose of any such discussion would be to allow all the bishops to formulate clear conference policy on aspects of the AIDS issue to whatever extent this is deemed necessary. I indicated that I would review this possibility with the members of the Administrative Board when it meets in March.

If this suggestion is accepted and implemented, this is the context in which the bishops will discuss the statement on AIDS. At this time, the statement of the Administrative Board stands and is neither being withdrawn nor temporarily set aside.

Homosexual ministers to be discussed

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — The pastor of a Montgomery church said this year's General Conference of the United Methodist Church will focus on a controversy over whether homosexuals should be ordained as ministers.

The Rev. John Ed Mathison, pastor of Frazer Memorial United Methodist Church, was among 48 ministers who met in Houston last month to draw up a declaration opposing a proposed change that would accept homosexuals into the church ministry.

Mathison said the group plans to fight a decision to remove wording from the United Methodist Book of Discipline that now excludes homosexuals from acceptance into the church's ministry. The change was proposed in October by the United Methodist Church Board of Higher Education and Ministry and will be presented in April to the quadrennial General Conference in St. Louis, Mo.

The group's resolution against the change, dubbed the "Houston Declaration" after the city in which the ministers met, is not aimed at singling out homosexuality as sinful, Mathison said.

"It's not that we're trying to single out one specific lifestyle," he said. "We're just responding to the part that this board singled out."

Still, Mathison said the United Methodist Church has treated homosexuality as a sin, much like adultery.

"It would be the same situation," he said. "If someone were a self-avowed, practicing homosexual, somebody has to say 'Hey, you can't do that.'"

"And if a minister is involved with somebody other than his wife in a relationship, then that person likewise would have a right to a trial but could have their credentials taken away."

Homosexual minister goes on trial Monday

By MICHAEL MOKRZYCKI
Associated Press Writer

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — A United Methodist Church trial starts Monday for a lesbian minister who is battling her dismissal by challenging church law that says homosexuality is incompatible with Christian teaching.

"That's a pretty broad statement to make," said the Rev. Rose Mary Denman. "If church law said homosexuality is incompatible with current United Methodist teaching, then I wouldn't have a leg to stand on."

The law was refined in 1984 at the quadrennial United Methodist general conference to make explicit the ban against ordination or appointment of homosexual ministers.

At the time, Denman had not accepted that she was a lesbian and supported the ban, telling her superiors she might even leave the denomination if homosexuals were allowed to become pastors.

Denman, 40, says she went from "blatant, raw, fear-filled homophobia" to acceptance of her own lesbianism in a matter of months. She confided this to her superior, Bishop George Bashore of Boston, and the church granted her two, one-year leaves from her two parishes in Conway, N.H. She moved to Portland, Maine, with her lover, the ex-wife of a minister.

Denman plans to transfer in November to the Unitarian Universalist Association, which she finds more accepting of her lifestyle, and she sought a third leave to cover the period until then.

United Methodist law allows up to five consecutive leaves, but the church's Board of Ordained Ministry denied her another leave.

Then the church's New Hampshire annual conference ordered a trial on whether to defrock Denman. The trial, with a jury of 13 ministers, starts Monday in Durham.

In a telephone interview last week, Denman said she is fighting her ouster on principle. The United Universalist Association has told her that, barring other complications, she will be accepted as a minister regardless of the outcome of the Methodist trial.

"Who wants to leave with the governing body saying that you are unacceptable, that your behavior is inappropriate and that they have no regard for you as a member of the clergy? That's what happens if I don't put up a fight," Denman said.

To buttress her argument that church law too broadly labels homosexuality as inconsistent with Christian teaching, Denman plans to call three witnesses, all theologians from non-Methodist Christian denominations, one a lesbian.

But Denman said the trial's presiding bishop, Neil Irons, has asked her counsel, the Rev. John McDougall of Enfield, not to call the witnesses. Church law allows the presiding bishop to refuse any witness.

"John insisted it was his right to call them. Also it is Bishop Irons' right not to allow them, but John was going to force the issue" on the record Monday, Denman said.

A spokeswoman at Irons' office in Pennington, N.J., said Friday the bishop had no comment.

Homosexual minister goes on trial Monday

By MICHAEL MOKRZYCKI
Associated Press Writer

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — A United Methodist Church trial starts Monday for a lesbian minister who is battling her dismissal by challenging church law that says homosexuality is incompatible with Christian teaching.

"That's a pretty broad statement to make," said the Rev. Rose Mary Denman. "If church law said homosexuality is incompatible with current United Methodist teaching, then I wouldn't have a leg to stand on."

The law was refined in 1984 at the quadrennial United Methodist general conference to make explicit the ban against ordination or appointment of homosexual ministers.

At the time, Denman had not accepted that she was a lesbian and supported the ban, telling her superiors she might even leave the denomination if homosexuals were allowed to become pastors.

Denman, 40, says she went from "blatant, raw, fear-filled homophobia" to acceptance of her own lesbianism in a matter of months. She confided this to her superior, Bishop George Bashore of Boston, and the church granted her two, one-year leaves from her two parishes in Conway, N.H. She moved to Portland, Maine, with her lover, the ex-wife of a minister.

Denman plans to transfer in November to the Unitarian Universalist Association, which she finds more accepting of her lifestyle, and she sought a third leave to cover the period until then.

United Methodist law allows up to five consecutive leaves, but the church's Board of Ordained Ministry denied her another leave.

Then the church's New Hampshire annual conference ordered a trial on whether to defrock Denman. The trial, with a jury of 13 ministers, starts Monday in Durham.

In a telephone interview last week, Denman said she is fighting her ouster on principle. The United Universalist Association has told her that, barring other complications, she will be accepted as a minister regardless of the outcome of the Methodist trial.

"Who wants to leave with the governing body saying that you are unacceptable, that your behavior is inappropriate and that they have no regard for you as a member of the clergy? That's what happens if I don't put up a fight," Denman said.

To buttress her argument that church law too broadly labels homosexuality as inconsistent with Christian teaching, Denman plans to call three witnesses, all theologians from non-Methodist Christian denominations, one a lesbian.

But Denman said the trial's presiding bishop, Neil Irons, has asked her counsel, the Rev. John McDougall of Enfield, not to call the witnesses. Church law allows the presiding bishop to refuse any witness.

"John insisted it was his right to call them. Also it is Bishop Irons' right not to allow them, but John was going to force the issue" on the record Monday, Denman said.

A spokeswoman at Irons' office in Pennington, N.J., said Friday the bishop had no comment.

Gay Catholics arrested

NEW YORK (AP) — A protest Mass celebrated outside St. Patrick's Cathedral led to the arrest of 23 homosexuals demonstrating against what they consider to be their exclusion from the church.

The demonstration Sunday was the latest in a series by Dignity, an organization of homosexual Roman Catholics that has been banned from using facilities of the New York archdiocese.

Group wants to help homosexuals obtain a heterosexual orientation

(EDITOR'S NOTE — Attitudes toward homosexuality have changed in recent years, but there's a small and reportedly growing group among gay men and women who believe homosexuals can and should shift to heterosexual orientation. The group is dedicated to furthering that effort.)

By DANA KENNEDY
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) — In his youth and in his 20s, Randy Childs remembers going to Boston's red-light district, the Combat Zone, for furtive homosexual encounters. These days, married and the father of a newborn, Childs helps others trying to overcome homosexuality.

Childs, 40, was among seven men and one woman who gathered upstairs at Ruggles Baptist Church one recent Saturday night, but most in the group were reluctant to talk openly about their goal: attempting to shed homosexuality and lead a straight life.

Though the group calls itself Homosexuals Anonymous and follows some of the same precepts espoused by Alcoholics Anonymous, Gamblers Anonymous and similar organizations, Childs said the movement to help homosexuals go straight is still an "open secret."

Because those who join such groups are concerned about what they regard as the stigma of homosexuality and doubt if they can overcome it, they hesitate to discuss their struggle publicly, group leaders said.

But groups to help homosexuals attain a heterosexual orientation are growing around the country, with a jump in membership in the past few years since the AIDS epidemic has taken hold, those active in that effort say. They acknowledge that only a small fraction of the gay population is involved.

Most of the groups dedicated to helping homosexuals go straight are religious, usually evangelical. They are called "ex-gay ministries" and include such groups as Homosexuals Anonymous, based in Reading, Pa., Life Ministry in New York, Desert Stream in Santa Monica, Calif., and Exodus International and Love in Action, both based in San Rafael, Calif.

While some of the most active in the movement believe homosexuality to be an aberration, the majority said they are not anti-gay.

"If you want to stay gay, that's your business," said Sy Rogers, 30, of Orlando, Fla., who calls himself a former homosexual and transsexual and is now married and the father of one. "But the bottom line is, you have a choice to overcome it. You can change."

AP Newsfeatures photo
Group leaders — Randy Childs, left, and Peter Robicheau Jr., are active in the Homosexuals Anonymous group.

Peter Robichéau, one of the group leaders of Homosexuals Anonymous in Boston, said, "It doesn't happen overnight. You change as you begin to discover the origins and roots of your homosexuality. The biggest thing is to be able to share it."

Robichéau, 32 and single, said he has not practiced homosexuality but it has been part of his "thought life." He said he has never been active sexually and does not plan to before he is married.

Most of the groups maintain that homosexuality is a learned behavior stemming from an early emotional detachment from a same-sex parent. They counsel new members that heterosexuality can be attained by overcoming what they believe was the emotional neediness that caused them to be homosexual.

THEIR THEORIES CLASH with more prevalent thoughts about homosexuality.

"These kinds of programs fly in the face of all social science research," said Urvashi Vaid, spokesman for the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force in Washington, D.C. "We think these are people really troubled by their sexuality who've constructed a whole mythology about how it is morally wrong. Programs of conversion are dangerous — they're based on an erroneous understanding of sexual behavior."

Ex-gay ministries point out that sex therapists William Masters and Virginia Johnson offer a program for those who want to turn away from homosexuality. A handful of psychiatrists, such as Lawrence Hatterer, who spent 15 years at New York's Payne Whitney clinic at New York Hospital and wrote "Changing Homosexuality in the Male," also believe homosexuality results from environmental factors.

"Most people don't think it's possible to change," said Frank Worthen, 58, founder of Love in Action, one of the first ex-gay ministries, who spent 25 years in what those in the movement call the "gay subculture."

Worthen said he was close to suicide after his years as an active homosexual, which he said began at age 13 when he was initiated into homosexuality by his pastor.

"When I was 19 I went to San Francisco to live and from the eyes of a 19-year-old, it was a pretty exciting life," said Worthen, who married a woman he met through his ministry

three years ago. "I had been rejected in high school. I never had friends. To enter this lifestyle where people are like you is very exciting."

Despite several serious relationships, including one that lasted 11 years, Worthen says he became "despondent and unhappy."

"I got into a promiscuous lifestyle that hurt my self-esteem," he said. "I was thinking about committing suicide. A lot of my friends had. They said they had had the best years of the gay life and didn't want to face the last years because of the rejection."

When Worthen made the decision to give up homosexuality, "I felt like a weight had been lifted off my shoulders."

Stories like Worthen's are not uncommon within ex-gay ministries.

Sy Rogers is one of the most unusual examples. Now married and the father of a 2-year-old daughter, 10 years ago Rogers lived as a woman with two other homosexuals in preparation for a sex-change operation.

Rogers said he began having homosexual encounters when he was 8. In a brief autobiography titled "The Man in the Mirror," passed out at ex-gay ministries, Rogers tells of a youth spent wishing he were a girl.

"Watching movies as a child, I remember the girl was always the object of the hero's attention and affection," Rogers wrote. "My heart would ache as I thought 'I wish I were wanted like that.'"

IN HIS YOUTH, Rogers became involved in prostitution and drug abuse and served as best man in a wedding ceremony for two homosexual friends. Later, he started taking female hormones and began living as a woman in anticipation of a sex-change operation.

Like Worthen, Rogers said his disillusionment with what he calls his "Twilight Zone" existence led him to seek change. He said a religious experience helped him overcome homosexuality. He met his wife in a Bible study group.

Rogers now runs his own ministry in Orlando, delivers a weekly radio program called the "Sy Rogers Report" and this fall launched a weekly cable television program called "Turnaround."

Bishops to discuss homosexuality

By VIVIAN CANNON
Press Register Religion Editor

The United Methodist bishop for the Alabama-West Florida Conference said Tuesday in Point Clear that he does not expect approval of changes at the denomination's general conference in April that would allow a homosexual to be ordained as a minister.

Several church agencies have proposed the changes, said Bishop J. Lloyd Knox of Birmingham, but efforts to kill the measure are already under way.

Alabama's delegates are "solidly against" the changes, he said.

Knox said the Book of Discipline under its social principals recognizes the "civil and human rights" of all people but those guidelines "do not condone the practice of homosexuality and consider this practice incompatible with Christian teaching."

RULES FOR ordination deny the practice and prevent "self-avowing practicing homosexuals" from either being ordained as ministers or appointed to church offices.

"We feel — at least I do — that the ministry is not a civil right," said Knox. "It is a calling."

Knox said "a lot of homosexuals feel they are born that way but we say, 'If you are, then your Christian faith should give you self-discipline.'"

Except for the homosexual issue which Knox labeled as "sensationalism," he expects the annual meeting to be "relatively dull."

A new and controversial hymnal which has been edited to meet the demands of members will probably be approved, he said, and should be ready for distribution by 1989.

HE ALSO hopes the general conference will approve a change being presented by him that would give him a counterpart in Alabama.

Knox currently serves as bishop of the North Alabama Conference as well as the one in the southern half of the state and Florida panhandle.

It requires him to oversee 21 separate districts which involve approximately 1,600 churches and more than 300,000 members and could be better handled by two bishops in the state.

The general conference will be held April 26-May 6 in St. Louis.

Abp. May re-affirms statement on AIDS

WASHINGTON (NC) — Here is the text of the Dec. 29 statement by Archbishop John L. May of St. Louis, president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and U.S. Catholic Conference, on the status of the AIDS statement issued by the USCC Administrative Board.

On December 17, I wrote to all the bishops a private letter concerning the recent statement of the Administrative Board of the conference on "The Many Faces of AIDS."

My letter reviewed in some detail the careful preparation which preceded the issuance of the statement. It also reviewed some of the widespread misperceptions occasioned by the document's release — misperceptions which brought some measure of pain to some of my fellow bishops.

Finally, I suggested in the letter that the June meeting of the conference might include a full discussion of certain principles of moral theology and their specific application to the AIDS epidemic in this country. The primary purpose of any such discussion would be to allow all the bishops to formulate clear conference policy on aspects of the AIDS issue to whatever extent this is deemed necessary. I indicated that I would review this possibility with the members of the Administrative Board when it meets in March.

If this suggestion is accepted and implemented, this is the context in which the bishops will discuss the statement on AIDS. At this time, the statement of the Administrative Board stands and is neither being withdrawn nor temporarily set aside.

Homosexual ministers to be discussed

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — The pastor of a Montgomery church said this year's General Conference of the United Methodist Church will focus on a controversy over whether homosexuals should be ordained as ministers.

The Rev. John Ed Mathison, pastor of Frazer Memorial United Methodist Church, was among 48 ministers who met in Houston last month to draw up a declaration opposing a proposed change that would accept homosexuals into the church ministry.

Mathison said the group plans to fight a decision to remove wording from the United Methodist Book of Discipline that now excludes homosexuals from acceptance into the church's ministry. The change was proposed in October by the United Methodist Church Board of Higher Education and Ministry and will be presented in April to the quadrennial General Conference in St. Louis, Mo.

The group's resolution against the change, dubbed the "Houston Declaration" after the city in which the ministers met, is not aimed at singling out homosexuality as sinful, Mathison said.

"It's not that we're trying to single out one specific lifestyle," he said. "We're just responding to the part that this board singled out."

Still, Mathison said the United Methodist Church has treated homosexuality as a sin, much like adultery.

"It would be the same situation," he said. "If someone were a self-avowed, practicing homosexual, somebody has to say 'Hey, you can't do that.'"

"And if a minister is involved with somebody other than his wife in a relationship, then that person likewise would have a right to a trial but could have their credentials taken away."

Homosexual minister goes on trial Monday

By MICHAEL MOKRZYCKI

Associated Press Writer

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — A United Methodist Church trial starts Monday for a lesbian minister who is battling her dismissal by challenging church law that says homosexuality is incompatible with Christian teaching.

"That's a pretty broad statement to make," said the Rev. Rose Mary Denman. "If church law said homosexuality is incompatible with current United Methodist teaching, then I wouldn't have a leg to stand on."

The law was refined in 1984 at the quadrennial United Methodist general conference to make explicit the ban against ordination or appointment of homosexual ministers.

At the time, Denman had not accepted that she was a lesbian and supported the ban, telling her superiors she might even leave the denomination if homosexuals were allowed to become pastors.

Denman, 40, says she went from "blatant, raw, fear-filled homophobia" to acceptance of her own lesbianism in a matter of months. She confided this to her superior, Bishop George Bashore of Boston, and the church granted her two, one-year leaves from her two parishes in Conway, N.H. She moved to Portland, Maine, with her lover, the ex-wife of a minister.

Denman plans to transfer in November to the Unitarian Universalist Association, which she finds more accepting of her lifestyle, and she sought a third leave to cover the period until then.

United Methodist law allows up to five consecutive leaves, but the church's Board of Ordained Ministry denied her another leave.

Then the church's New Hampshire annual conference ordered a trial on whether to defrock Denman. The trial, with a jury of 13 ministers, starts Monday in Durham.

In a telephone interview last week, Denman said she is fighting her ouster on principle. The United Universalist Association has told her that, barring other complications, she will be accepted as a minister regardless of the outcome of the Methodist trial.

"Who wants to leave with the governing body saying that you are unacceptable, that your behavior is inappropriate and that they have no regard for you as a member of the clergy? That's what happens if I don't put up a fight," Denman said.

To buttress her argument that church law too broadly labels homosexuality as inconsistent with Christian teaching, Denman plans to call three witnesses, all theologians from non-Methodist Christian denominations, one a lesbian.

But Denman said the trial's presiding bishop, Neil Irons, has asked her counsel, the Rev. John McDougall of Enfield, not to call the witnesses. Church law allows the presiding bishop to refuse any witness.

"John insisted it was his right to call them. Also it is Bishop Irons' right not to allow them, but John was going to force the issue" on the record Monday, Denman said.

A spokeswoman at Irons' office in Pennington, N.J., said Friday the bishop had no comment.

